The ECO Certification logos may only be used to promote products that have gained certification. If the certification logo is used on the front cover of a brochure containing both certified and non-certified products, the logo must always be accompanied by an asterisk next to the certified products and the following statement: “* this symbol nominates products that have gained certification under the ECO Certification program.”

In the case of visual electronic media (e.g. television), the ECO Certification logo may only be used for certified products. Operators must not imply that all products are equally certified if that is not the case.

In the case of audio electronic media (e.g. radio), certified products may mention the logo/certification, but the audio script must not imply that all products promoted are certified.

If a brochure contains products with more than one level of certification, the certification logo of the lowest level may be displayed on the front cover with an asterisk and a statement “*this symbol nominates products that have gained certification under the ECO Certification program.” Alternatively, the generic ECO certified tourism logo may be used where there are multiple levels of certification achieved. The appropriate level logo should be displayed alongside relevant products.
EcoGuides are tour guides committed to being masters of environmental knowledge in the areas they take you and dedicated to providing authentic experiences. EcoGuides not only know how to ensure your adventures around Australia have minimal impact on the environment, but are very well experienced and have a passion for all things nature.

The EcoGuide logo may be used to advertise that products use the service of a certified EcoGuide for their tours. In the case where not all guides are certified EcoGuides, operators must not suggest that all tours are conducted by certified EcoGuides. In this instance the logo must be accompanied by an asterisk with the following statement: “*not all tours are conducted by certified EcoGuides”
